"Zawadi, are you alright?" Mother asked one night when she came into my room. It was past midnight but I was still awake.

"Leave me alone!" I replied.

"This is not you!" she said softly; full of concern and love. She came closer, placed her hands on my back.

"You have become withdrawn, gloomy and irritable. Most of the time, you are absent-minded. Is there anything wrong, my daughter?"

I did not answer. I just stared blankly at the pile of exercise books on the table.

"Why are you copying note so late the night," she noticed what I was doing.

"I had a lot of assignments today. I did not get time to copy the notes from the blackboard." I hated lying to Mother. How could I explain to her the pain in my heart? Could she believe that instead of writing the Social Studies notes in my book as Mrs Cate taught, I was busy writing notes for Madula?

Madula was huge and taller than me. When Madula and I stood next to each other, she saw the top of my head while my eyes went as far as her chin. I had to tilt my head back to see her better.

It was claimed that she had beaten a teacher in her previous school. That was why she was transferred to our school. For fear of being embarrassed, I followed all her commands.

In the morning, just before lessons, I wiped her desk and chair using my uniform. As if that was not enough, she rolled my sweater into a ball which she used to play kati in the field. During kati, a player aims the ball at another player who dodges it.

My agony was extended to the evenings when I grudgingly carried her school bag and escorted her up to the gate of their home.

Madula's threats took different dimensions. In class, I was not allowed to raise my hand to answer questions. Woe to me if I emerged at the top in an examination; Madula pulled my ears.

Read the passage below and answer questions 41 to 50.

The eagle and the kite were once great friends. Their homes were close to each other. The eagle's nest was on the summit of a large thorny tree. The kite had built her nest on a branch of a blue gum tree.

The two friends loved to soar high in the sky as they hunted for food together. They would share whatever they got equally. The kite went broody one day ' after laying two eggs. Likewise, the eagle, seeing the kite sitting on eggs, too, laid two eggs. "I can't stay without a family of my own when the kite is making hers," said the eagle to herself.

The two birds would leave their nests and go to hunt before returning to their eggs.

Then one day, the eagle left alone. A huge snake happened to climb up the thorn tree to the eagle's nest. On seeing the pair of eggs, the snake swallowed them and slithered away.

When the eagle returned to the nest, there were no eggs. The eagle believed the kite was envious and had a hand in the disappearance of her eggs. She was about to go and ask the kite when she saw the kite flying away to hunt for food.

"It seems the kite feared me and took off," said the eagle to herself. On examining the kite's eggs, the eagle was convinced they were hers. She took them to her nest and sat on them. When the kite returned from hunting, she met an empty nest.

"Alas!" cried the kite. 'Something must have eaten my eggs!' The eagle claimed to have not seen anything upon being asked. "May I see your eggs?" asked the kite.

The eagle refused saying getting up would take the warmth from the eggs. "Don't accuse me of stealing your eggs. These are my eggs!"

An owl happened to be sitting on branch nearby and heard the two arguing. "Stop arguing among yourselves, for when the eggs hatch, the truth will be out."

The two friends agreed with the wise owl. After a few days, the eggs the eagle sat on hatched. The eagle was very happy and worried at the same time.

As the pair of hatchlings grew, they began making sound that was not common even among the eaglets. The kite heard these noises and was curious.

The eagle, unable to silence the two little kites and fearing to be found out, began eating them. The kite perched in time to see the eagle tearing one little kite to pieces.

"You stole my eggs so as to eat my babies when they hatch?" shouted the kite.

The two birds began fighting. To this day they soar while fighting in air.
