Read the passage below and answer questions 31 to 40.

One Monday morning, Wafula and Wanjala were walking to school when they found two one-thousand-shilling notes. Wanjala picked the money. The boys had never come across so much money before. 'What shall we do with this money?' Wanjala asked.

'Share it of course,' Wafula replied. 'You take one thousand and I take one. If we bought sweets with it, we could give more than ten to each of our classmates.'

'And then what would we do if someone claimed the money afterwards?' Wanjala asked. 'Who would know that we were the ones who found the money?' Wafula asked impatiently. 'No one saw us!' They walked on and met their friends at the school gate. 'Listen, friends,' Wafula announced. 'This is the luckiest day for us!' he shouted. 'We have just found two thousand shillings. We will buy sweets for you every day, for more than a week,' he said, hoping the other boys would help him persuade Wanjala. Some boys suggested that they share the money and keep it a secret. They all nodded except Wanjala who looked at them, surprised. When he finally spoke, he told them he was going to take the money to the headteacher. He was going to explain how he got it. The headteacher thanked Wanjala for his honesty and promised to find the owner of the money.

Just after the lessons had started, Njuguna the shopkeeper walked into the headteacher's office. 'Good morning, Mr Mwise,' Njuguna greeted the headteacher. 'Has any of your pupils reported finding any money on their way to school? I remember seeing two boys walking behind me.' The headteacher told him about the money Wanjala had - brought to the office. He took the money from the drawer and gave it to Njuguna. Wanjala was called to the office. Njuguna thanked him and promised to buy him two storybooks.

Read the passage below and answer questions 41 to 50.

There once lived in Rumuruti a middle-aged man called Wang' ondu. He kept a flock of sheep which he used to take out to the surrounding grasslands to graze. Among this flock was a notorious ram called Rwanio, known for excessive bleating. He would bleat in the grazing field and in the fold. He did it with an empty mouth and with a full one. Even worse, in the grazing field, he rarely browsed. Restless and disgruntled, he spent most of the time on the move; and more often than not, he strayed into neighbours' shambas.

Once at home, Wang' ondu would complain to Nyakio, his wife, saying, "Rwanio has given me a very hard time controlling him today." One evening, he complained of a sore toe after tripping while driving the naughty animal from Githinji's farm. Empathising with her husband, Nyakio advised him, "Wang' ondu, you see, we have to deal with this nuisance once and for all." "Certainly, but how? Or do we turn him into mutton and soup?" "No, please. Let him be left behind at home while the others go out to pasture," Nyakio responded. "I'll be looking after him to see whether he will change." From the next day, Rwanio was left in the fold and fed with choice feed like various sweet vines and bran, but did he give his minder any easy time? Not at all! He bleated, stomped and marched as usual. That evening, Nyakio moaned to Wang' ondu, "This morning he trampled on my thumb as I was tethering him." There was this day Wang' ondu had another commitment and so all the sheep stayed at home. At about 10 in the morning, Nyakio heard a knock on her door. "Welcome, Githinji," she said, ushering the neighbour in. After finishing the tea and some doughnuts Nyakio had served him, he fished a note out of his pocket and gave it to her. It said: "Dear Nyakio, Morning! Githinji has my direction instructions to slaughter Rwanio for the visiting members of your self- help group. Please let him keep the skin. Also reserve the head, shanks and every bone for making soup. Great day".
